Welcome
On June 13, 2007, Michael O. Leavitt, Secretary, U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, convened a Leadership Forum on pandemic preparedness, which brought together influential leaders from the business, faith-based, civic and health care sectors to discuss how to convince and help Americans prepare for a possible influenza pandemic. The Department hosted this short-term blog to expand the conversation leading up to and following the Leadership Forum. While comments are no longer enabled, the wealth of insight from this open dialogue will remain available online as part of the Department's ongoing effort to help Americans prepare.

Sustainable, Affordable Support to Stressed Populations

TIDES is a research project dedicated to open-source knowledge sharing to promote sustainable support to populations under severe stress—post-war, post-disaster, or impoverished, in foreign or domestic contexts, for short-term or long-term (multi-year) operations. The project provides reach-back "knowledge on demand" to decision-makers and those working in the field. It helps catalyze public-private, whole-of-government, and trans-national approaches to encourage unity of action among diverse organizations where there is no unity of command. TIDES maintains this website, where anyone in the project’s network (called STAR-TIDES) can publish their work for feedback and critique.

NHIN Direct: Open Healthcare Records and Government as a Platform

by Tim O'Reilly | @timoreilly | comments: 12

In my advocacy around Government 2.0, I've been focused on the idea that government should act like a platform provider rather than a complete solution provider. That is, government should lay down rules of the road, create core functionality that others can build on, and then let the private sector compete to flesh out the offerings.

You'd never think it from the right-wing media hysteria around the administration's health care initiatives, but some of the best thinking about minimal government intervention is happening right now in healthcare. I met yesterday morning with Dr. David Brumental, the National Coordinator for healthcare policy, and I was struck by how he is focused on the idea of the least possible government intervention in the market. "We have to do as little as we have to do in order to have a strong probability to succeed," he told me.
